Council Meeting
July 26, 2023
Hybrid Meeting - Washington, DC

Cooperative Agreement Between
SAA and the Association of Polish Archivists
(Prepared by: Terry Baxter, President)

BACKGROUND

In January 2022, Becky Tousey contacted SAA leadership about a request by the organizing committee at the 8th Polish Archivists Congress. As SAA's representative to ICA, they had asked her to present one of their international plenaries. She had a scheduling conflict and suggested that the incoming SAA president might be a good alternative. The Polish Archivists Association (<https://sap.waw.pl/>) agreed, and in September 2022, I presented a plenary titled "Contemporary and Future Challenges to Archives and Society in the United States."

I was also able to participate in a variety of formal and informal events and conversations with archivists in attendance, many of them representing leadership in the Polish Archivists Association. One recurring topic related to formal cooperation between the Polish Archivists Association (SAP) and the Society of American Archivists. There was a stated desire among their leadership to build stronger ties with other countries' archival organizations beyond what already exists via the ICA umbrella.

I have kept in contact with several of the friends made during that meeting, including Wiesław Nowosad, the Vice President for International Cooperation for SAP and an executive member of ICA's Forum for Professional Associations (FPA). We've continued to discuss how SAA and SAP could promote mutually beneficial cooperation. Appendix A is an agreement between SAP and the Ukraine Archivists Association. Appendix B is the same agreement run through Google Polish – English translate. Wiesław stresses that SAP does not want to copy this document but that it is a starting point for discussing how SAA and SAP might build a cooperative agreement based on their strengths, needs, and interests.

DISCUSSION

The Society of American Archivists has had an ongoing commitment to positive interaction with the international archives' community. It sends representatives to the International Council on Archives, particularly to the Forum of Professional Associations. It maintains an Intellectual Property Working Group and an International Affairs Section. It dedicates publishing space in the American Archivist for international articles. Additionally, a number of component groups have international connections.

Archivists in the United States benefit in many ways from the work of and relationships with archivists and archival communities in other countries. SAA's standards work is a direct result of the collaboration of a variety of international archivists. The work of Verne Harris in connecting social justice to archival work has been a key influence on theory and practice in the United States. Kim Christen's widely used Murkutu platform was developed through collaborative work with the Waramungu community in what is now known as Australia. The Protocols for Native American Archival Materials has its roots in the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Protocols. David Lewis' work with the Southwest Oregon Research Project was an early model for community archives collections. I'm not even going to mention that Fever book . . .

As far as I can tell, SAA does not have any cooperative agreements with any national archival organizations. In many ways, its interaction is with the international community as a whole and not with individual archival organizations. The former is an important means of cooperation and collaboration. It reinforces the inherently human nature of memory work and allows varied approaches to that work to build solutions that expand global solidarity.

The appeal of a cooperative agreement with an individual organization allows for a deeper understanding of the way a particular group of archivists thinks and how they perform their work. It builds a relationship between the two groups of archival workers, which allows both groups to learn new ways of thinking about their own work as well as envisioning how joint work could enrich both cultures in which they're situated. A cooperative agreement can acknowledge that solutions to shared problems might be addressed and resolved through joint efforts. Additionally, an agreement acknowledges that organizations may discover relevant and meaningful ideas outside of their own sphere.

This request is based on the relationships built among individuals. While that is also a valuable concern and is intertwined with organizational relationships, it is not a long-term strategy. A formal connection, based in cooperative agreement, allows the two organizations to build bonds that transcend individuality and promote mutuality. We all know people come and go in organizations – this agreement builds a stable basis for these two organizations to work together and lets them cooperatively look at how joint work gets done and how they hold each other accountable for it.

This agreement also has the potential for modeling more group to group-to-group relationships to augment the process we are already engaged in with ICA. These do not have to be separate processes. There is a natural overlap between an agreement like this and participation in ICA, one that doesn't have to be competitive but could be cooperative to the benefit of all involved.

It also has the potential to bring fun and joy into these two organizations. Connecting with other humans to perform cooperative work has many benefits – emotional, intellectual, and social – it is the way humans build community. Agreements like this could make archival workers and archival work worldwide more connected, more relatable, more secure, and more resilient.

QUESTIONS FOR DISCUSSION

- Would this work benefit SAA members and the archival worker community at large?
- Why initiate the process with the Polish Archives Association?
- Who would be responsible for drafting a cooperative agreement?
- How would the administration of a program like this affect SAA component groups and staff workloads?
- Are the ongoing costs for a program like this worth the ongoing benefit?
