

“Old stuff, old stuff, really old stuff”: University Students’ Perceptions of Academic Archives and Their Relevance to Student Experience

ASHLEY TODD-DIAZ and PEYTON CLEARY

University archives seek to work with and represent all members of their community equitably. But research has shown that many students are not familiar with archives and/or do not think they are relevant to them. Low levels of awareness and engagement are critical problems that archivists and librarians need to address. This is the premise for an ongoing research project at Towson University that aims to gauge undergraduate and graduate student awareness of archives and determine how students want to be centered in outreach efforts. This data will be used to reimagine existing approaches to outreach in ways that will encourage more collaborative and meaningful partnerships between students, archivists, and librarians.

This session will share the initial findings from a survey of students addressing topics of student awareness and perceptions of archives, interest in contributing to a collective history, and how archivists and librarians can empower students to see themselves as important stakeholders in shaping and preserving history. We will also share our goals for future research, including our plans for directly involving students and institutional partners across the country to collaboratively develop and pilot innovative outreach approaches that center students.

About the authors:

Ashley Todd-Diaz is Assistant University Librarian for Special Collections and University Archives at Towson University. She also teaches as an adjunct professor in Emporia State University’s School of Library and Information Management and Drexel University’s College of Computing and Informatics. Her interests include archives as organizations, perceptions of archives, and archival literacy. She holds a Ph.D. from Emporia State University’s School of Library and Information Management, an MSIS with a concentration in Archives and Records Administration from SUNY at Albany, and an MA in English and American Literature from New York University.

Peyton Cleary is a second-year graduate student at the University of Delaware, pursuing an MA in History. Peyton holds a BS in History from Towson University, where she worked with Dr. Todd-Diaz at Towson University’s Special Collections and University Archives as a research assistant. She currently works at Hagley Museum & Library in the Audiovisual and Digital Initiatives Department. Her research interests include 20th and 21st century social movements, student activism, and archival accessibility and inclusivity.